To create new database tables in your existing Rails 5.2 application, you can try to add the code to `app/models/your_model_name.rb` file. But we all know that is not a good solution. Let's say your app is an e-commerce app that has orders and customers tables in a database. For the orders table, the controllers can have a code like this: This creates the orders table with customer id as a foreign key. So you can access the customer details from here and set the same as a `@customer` instance variable. This is a rough example to show you how you can do it, if you have not created your database tables and if you want to create some objects before creating actual tables. If you don't want to use AppGini, you can do it yourself as AppGini provides the ready-to-use models. This is how you can create the customer object: This is how you can create the order object: Now that you have the customer, order objects, you can create the controller and views for this. But you can also use any other framework to create a similar functionality. . Add a new table? You can also add a new table and run the application on the database. Say your app has an orders table that does not have any customer details. To add a new order table, you can follow this: Run the rails server: Start the database and add the orders table by using the following code: Now, you will be able to see the orders table you just added in the database.
