Sialoglycoprotein receptor (SGP-R) belongs to a group of glycoproteins (extracellular lectins) that are characterized by a glycan recognition site (exclusively located on the carbohydrate side) which selectively binds sialic acid containing oligosaccharides of various origins. The interaction of such glycoconjugates with their receptors may have an important pathophysiological role in the gastrointestinal mucosa because it influences processes such as protein digestion, microbial adhesion, cell differentiation, and migration. The SGP-R is a membrane bound receptor, the major component of which is a protein of molecular mass 70 kDa, which has been purified from mucosal scrapings of human and rat gastrointestinal tract. There is another form of the receptor, with a molecular mass of 230-250 kDa, that probably contains a carbohydrate recognition site. The molecular mass of this second form as well as the roles of its glycosylation have not been established yet. Lake Susitna Lake Susitna (; ; Lake Su'su'tna), also known as Upper Susitna

Reservoir, is a reservoir on the upper Clark Fork River in southeastern Washington. The Susitna River, a tributary of the Clark Fork, is drained by Lake Susitna. Lake Susitna was formed when the area was inhabited by the Tongass people. Today, the lake is popular among visitors and is the center of a summer recreation area. The lake's name, which means "wooden face" in Native American languages, comes from a legend in which a Tulalip person was beheaded by a young fool and his head stuck onto a tree. History The headwaters of the Clark Fork River flow into Lake Susitna in northern Skagit County near the town of Rockport. The river flows down the southern side of Mount Baker, part of the Cascade Range, where it receives the waters of numerous smaller tributaries, including the Snohomish River, the Deception River, the Chiwapunjel River, the Dellwood River, and the Copper Creek. The entire flow of the Clark Fork River is located on the northern half of the shoreline of Lake Susitna
