Enhanced roles in the high-level management of medical care for nurses and physicians with responsibility for quality of care in medical care settings. In the field of medical care in the United States, nurses and physicians alike are already responsible for a myriad of quality initiatives. Nurse and physician leaders in health care have said that there is a need for enhanced responsibility in the field of quality and outcomes management, in other words, greater participation by nurses and physicians in quality management and in executive management roles. Indeed, the need for quality improvement professionals with enhanced skill sets is ever more important in health care. The North American Faculty of Family Practice and International Academy of Family Practice made a statement in 1995, published in their journal: "The 'two-tiered' role of quality improvement and management does not provide optimum support for the increasingly complex roles being played by RNs and physicians in health care. In fact, the report 'Putting the patient first' acknowledges the inadequacies of existing role delineations. We agree that the roles and responsibility in health care can and should evolve to become more inclusive for nurses and physicians with experience in performing research, management, and leadership roles." Nurse and physician quality leaders recognize the need for these enhanced roles in high-level management to meet the growing complexity of roles and responsibility in managing and improving the quality of care. This article presents the findings of a research study commissioned by the American Association of Colleges of Nursing (AACN) Quality and Safety Program Center for Nursing Excellence (CNE). The purpose of the study was to identify the current status of quality and safety-related practice roles for RNs and physicians in high-level management positions in health care. As part of the study, a literature review was conducted, as well as a personal electronic survey and multiple telephone interviews. A second component of the study was to conduct, in conjunction with the AACN Nursing Workforce Interests and Needs survey, a qualitative study to elicit from nurse faculty their understanding of the merits and potential for expanding practice roles for nurses. This application is designed to help you view the webcams available in internet. You can click the camera view button given the URL of a webcam on the internet. A: There is a nice command in bash called curl. you can use it to scrape and get anything from the network. A: sikuli is a great tool, it does many other things too. If you are on Linux, it is fairly easy to install, and even easier to use. If you are on Windows, you'll have to google for an easy-to-install program like wine. Q: What kind of code do you expect to see in a question? Many internet users have the same questions. So, when asking, for example, "Why this code crashes", we can only expect the user to have written this code. Or, instead, we can assume that there are no such examples in the test cases, and can expect the user to expand his/her question accordingly. So, what kind of code would you expect in a question? A: If I expect to see a piece of code that's vaguely written, and it's got obvious problems (e.g. missing ; on a half-finished function that's started with a ;, or a stray debugging cout, or a variable that's not declared...), I'm going to be pretty short with answers (probably downvoting), unless it's a trivial matter. I'm less likely to answer a question about C++ or Java (or anything that's industry standard) that isn't using the specific types (int, String, etc) that you'd expect. A: In general, I like to expect basic code quality and I expect decent use of search engines. Something I will not accept: a very specific question involving some particularly obscure error that no one knows about. This is almost never a good question because we cannot possibly answer it for you, it is too specific, and we are not obliged to do it for free. Either the error is known to us and we can find a solution or there is no solution. Something I will not accept: a question that says "my code compiles but runs into error X." This may as well say "give me
