Q: Improving low power electronics I'm building a control board for a 25W board game (Unfortunately it is too hot to touch even with my finger and I'd like to limit its consumption to, say, 1W. What are my best options to reduce the power consumption of this project? I thought of using 4.7k-8.2k with LEDs but it seems that those would be too noisy. Besides I'd like to use an N-channel MOSFET as described below. I also thought about a low-power microcontroller for timing a 4.7k-8.2k, but that's too expensive. Finally, I can also limit the current at the board game circuit (which draws 350mA at 5V) using a voltage regulator (12V, 5A). A: If you are using a 5V supply you could fit a bunch of, say, NPN bipolar or dual output NAND gates. As you already have two pull-up resistors you can use an NE555 or divide by four from a number of inverting oscillator circuits on a 8K resistor. If 09e8f5149f

Patients with rheumatoid arthritis (RA) and psoriatic arthritis (PsA) frequently have joint complaints. Imaging is frequently used to monitor disease activity in RA and PsA. In this review, the relevant imaging modalities and their role in diagnosis and monitoring of disease activity are discussed. Radioisotopes, ultrasonography (US), MRI, CT and bone scintigraphy have been used in RA and PsA. US of inflamed joints is the first-line imaging method to assess synovitis in RA and PsA. In comparison to US, MRI provides higher accuracy for detecting bone marrow oedema in inflammatory arthritis. MRI in RA is used for longitudinal studies of disease activity and for post-treatment follow-up. MRI is also a useful method for assessing synovitis in PsA. There is growing evidence that MRI is superior to US for the detection of bone oedema in RA and PsA. Bone scintigraphy is used for disease monitoring in RA and PsA.
