The cell wall component of lung abscess pus was examined qualitatively and quantitatively in 20 strains of pneumococci and one of H. influenzae. Many features were found in common, but there were differences among the various species. The reaction between the cell wall component and the polyclonal antibody was so intense that it was possible to culture microorganisms with the antibody absorbed out. This antigen and the polyclonal antibody absorbed into Sephadex G-50 column was also able to agglutinate strains of streptococci. These findings suggest that the lung abscess cell wall is composed of a biologically active substance having a polysaccharide, protein and phospholipid component.An Intimate Remembrance An Intimate Remembrance Most of us have lost someone close to us. At times the pain or heartache of this loss has not lessened over time. Many of us struggle with carrying on with our lives since we no longer have the comfort of our loved one. For some of us, however, sorrow has gradually given way to acceptance. This
