Fallon/File Photo The strategy, adopted by the U.S. Forest Service in 2017, is designed to give firefighters better information about the extreme fire danger days to better protect communities from wildfire, according to Forest Service officials. Scientists who study California's wildland fires have noted the frequency of large fire outbreaks over the past several years, including a wildfire that destroyed the last of the century-old Ponderosa pines near Lake Arrowhead in Southern California and an historic blaze near the San Bernardino National Forest. The National Forest Foundation, an advocacy group that represents the forest industry, said a new report issued by the Department of the Interior shows the Forest Service increased spending on fire-related projects between 2015 and 2017 by $11.3 million. Forest Service officials said many projects funded by the program provide opportunities for local residents, while others focus on fire suppression, protection, and basic firefighting infrastructure. "We're getting resiliency back into the policy process," said John Abowd, associate deputy chief of the San Bernardino National Forest and fire program for the Forest Service. Two of those projects will be developed by the Forest Service, the agency said. Among other projects, the forest agency is spending $2.2 million to build firefighting roads and other structures within the San Bernardino National Forest, $750,000 for a reserve that helps reduce the risk of catastrophic fire outbreaks by offsetting losses to fuel, and $2 million to install a fire management technology site in support of fire suppression activities. The plan is currently being implemented, and will be active for 30 years, Forest Service
