Ask a question, find answers, and share tips.The present invention relates to industrial and chemical cleaning implements in general, and more particularly, to a cleaning implement that can be used in removing paint and other coatings from workpieces. Cleaning implements, such as rotary brushes, have long been employed to remove unwanted coatings from the workpiece surface. Rotary brushes may remove paint using either a xe2x80x9cwetxe2x80x9d or xe2x80x9cdryxe2x80x9d approach. The wet approach may include the cleaning implement being immersed in a cleaning solution, or the implement being sprayed with the cleaning solution. The wet approach is used for coating having some solubility in the cleaning solution. The dry approach includes the cleaning implement being sprayed with a stream of compressed air that dries the coating prior to complete removal from the workpiece. Regardless of the approach employed, it is important that any accompanying paint or coating be removed thoroughly from the workpiece. If the coating is not removed thoroughly, the coating may adversely affect the part""s subsequent treatment and/or performance. Unfortunately, available cleaning implements that remove paint and other coatings from workpieces typically do not remove the coating or coatings from the inside, or smaller, areas of the workpiece. Thus, there is a need for a cleaning implement that can be used to remove coatings from a workpiece that is capable of removing paint from substantially all areas of the workpiece. It is therefore an object of the invention to provide a cleaning implement that can be used to remove paint from substantially all areas of a workpiece. It is another object of the invention to provide a cleaning implement that is capable of removing paint from both the inside and the outside of the workpiece. It is another object of the invention to provide a cleaning implement that is capable of removing paint from a workpiece without damaging the

Also, the potential for geographic differences in hospital costs raises questions about the validity of our cost results, which largely depend on the availability of cost data, especially in the Medicaid population, and the relative accuracy of rates of cost components (e.g., unit cost) across sites. Because of the important role of hospital management in controlling costs and the inherent difficulties in estimating accurate unit costs at the provider level, our cost estimates at the provider level rely heavily on cost data reported by hospitals; however, unit costs for hospital procedures are widely variable, and there are certain geographic patterns in cost variability \[[@bib20]\]. We therefore believe that estimates of the hospital component of costs are reliable, although the quality and cost of care may vary for different populations within the Commonwealth. Finally, we recognize that our population-based sample, although large, includes only patients with Medicaid eligibility and that our comparisons are limited to one and five years, a time period when the Medicaid population represents only about a quarter of the inpatient population. Indeed, changes in utilization and costs are generally more pronounced for Medicaid patients than for other groups with insurance \[[@bib24]\]. In addition, this analysis excludes information on other health services that would help better understand overall financial implications of diabetes management, such as office visits, pharmacy, home health, and durable medical equipment costs. However, these issues are common to any claims-based study, and our real-world data would greatly improve our knowledge of clinical and financial outcomes among diabetic patients. Despite these limitations, we found that diabetes management is often sub 3da54e8ca3
