Is instant coffee a health risk? Although coffee continues to gain popularity, many people have taken the time to find out if instant coffee is a health risk. Let's break down the question and point out the facts of the issue. According to the Huffington Post, instant coffee has become a fad for people looking to cut out all the added sugar, corn syrup and chemicals in their regular coffee. However, despite this, instant coffee is still a low-calorie, low-fat alternative to full coffee, and sometimes more nutritious. The idea behind the instant coffee is that it will save your time, though coffee is one of the most common drug-free ways to start the day. Some health risks of instant coffee Instant coffee does carry a few health risks, but these risks are minimal. Although instant coffee will not have any calories or sugar, it may be easier for the body to process instant coffee. This means that instant coffee may make it easier for the body to process a large amount of caffeine. One may be thinking, "Well, if the caffeine is bad for you, it must be good for you." However, caffeine is a drug, and it can also mess with the body. If the body is not used to caffeine, then drinking a large amount of caffeine can cause it to jitter, flinch or have other caffeine-related symptoms. Instant coffee is caffeine-free, but not all caffeine-free options are healthy. There are many instant coffee options available, which may be low in other nutrients. Therefore, if the body becomes used to instant coffee, it may lose its ability to process other nutrients, and may cause a variety of health issues. Caffeine can also be bad for your body, especially when it is not absorbed from its original form. When caffeine is combined with other caffeine-like ingredients, it may become concentrated. All caffeine may be bad for your body if you drink too much of it, which can cause headaches, dizziness and sleep deprivation. If you are wondering if instant coffee is healthy, the answer is no. Many studies have shown that instant coffee has few beneficial or health-enhancing qualities. On the flip side, instant coffee can harm your body. The same effects that come with drinking too many caffeinated beverages can come from drinking too much instant coffee.Q: C++ convert std::string to char* Could

US election 2016: what shape is this map? After Donald Trump's biggest victory, what shape is the presidential electoral map? By Paul Gilbey The Guardian 3:02PM GMT 14 Nov 2016 Photos The Guardian The exit poll, a major source of data for pundits around the world, found that Clinton beat him by less than one point – 51% to 49%. In 2012, President Obama, who easily won in November 2012, took 50.9% of the vote. The last time there was such a close race was 2000, when there were 536 Electoral College votes on offer. There is no exit poll in the UK and if one were conducted in the US it would not be binding, but it suggests that the picture might look similar. [More] Here are some of the key electoral contests where Trump and Clinton are matched in popular vote. To win 270 Electoral

College votes, whichever candidate receives more votes in each state would be president. Some votes have been counted, others are still to be counted. Any percentages quoted are those given in each state as of 5pm on election night. It has not all been official until tonight at 22:00 EST in each state. This is the current electoral map, and this is how the previous few presidential elections have panned out. Key states Florida, to hold all of its 31 Electoral College votes, would appear to be up for grabs. Trump holds narrow leads in North Carolina and Georgia. Both states are unusual in having more registered Republicans than Democrats. On exit polls, Trump beat Clinton by 27%, but the spread varies from 17-22% depending on the state. In Florida and Georgia, some 53% of registered voters have identified as independent. In North Carolina, 37% identify as unaffiliated. Texas Hillary Clinton may have one of her easiest wins of the night, after polls consistently suggested that Barack Obama had no chance of beating John McCain in 2008. But Trump's performance, with a 10-point lead in all the latest polls, looks even more impressive than Obama's 20-point lead over McCain. Virginia The final poll of the night released at 10pm EST and showing a lead for Clinton, which would be good for a state she won by a wide margin in 2012. New Hampshire The Republican has a significant lead in this state, which he also won in 2012. But if Clinton wins any big
