This study was conducted to assess the animal care services in Japanese university hospitals in 2009 and 2010 to examine the current status of animal care services in university hospitals and ways to improve the services. From January through December in 2009 and 2010, we conducted a questionnaire survey of 110 acute care university hospitals that had more than 1,000 beds. The survey investigated the numbers of animal technicians, types of animal technicians, the animals cared for, the animal care facilities, and each related administrative procedure. In regard to the animal care services, 98.2% of the hospitals had no professional training in animal care technician (ACT) services, 49.5% of the hospitals did not have ACT, and the total number of ACT was less than 2 in 110 university hospitals surveyed. Personnel shortages were also apparent in 82.3% of the hospitals that cared for animals. The author addressed suggestions to improve the animal care services.Q: Unity 5 and Microsoft WebGL Extension I've seen Unity 5 support for WebGL as part of the experimental status.
