This article examines the phonological-phonetic structure of 3-year-olds' word representations to the extent that it contributes to the structure of their lexicon. The hypothesis is that the number and form of the phonological patterns the 3-year-old child employs to store the meanings of novel words are mediated by his or her word knowledge, and the 2 previous hypothesis, that the phonological-phonetic structure of novel words depends on their frequent usage, and that the phonological patterns of 3-year-olds differ from those of adults. Participants were 30 children aged 3 years, 2 months, a group of children aged 3 years, 6 months, and a control group of children aged 4 years. Participants listened to the syllables of an artificial language and repeated the corresponding phonemes in a repeat-naming task. Participants' responses were analyzed and compared between groups and age-ranges. Findings indicated that 3-year-olds remembered the phonemes of artificial words much more frequently and distinctly than their 4-year-old counterparts. This was corroborated by psychometric analyses which revealed reliable measures of phonological complexity and frequency in 3-year-olds. Phonological complexity was correlated to phonological awareness and word knowledge, which further corroborates the hypothesis that phonological patterns reflect the structure of word representations. The results indicated no distinct influence of word knowledge on the phonological-phonetic structure of word representations in 3-year-olds, contrary to earlier investigations. The results are discussed with respect to the comprehension and learning of new words in children of different ages.Hard Water (film) Hard Water (foaled 3 January 2002 in Ireland) is an Irish-bred, British-trained Thoroughbred racehorse and sire.
