The social media diet reduces memory and cognitive deficits. Social media is embedded in our everyday lives, but it remains unclear how it affects brain function. In addition, not everyone is equally affected by social media, yet little is known about the underlying reasons. Here we provide evidence that, even after removal of social media from users, they exhibit impaired memory and reduced processing speed relative to nonusers. We further show that this deficit is specific to the mere presence of social media, a finding that is important to distinguish from mere accessibility effects. Using an experimental design that isolates the effects of social media from other confounding factors, we further show that removing access to social media increases memory and processing speed, which may lead to increased social network size. These results identify for the first time that even brief exposure to social media has measurable consequences for cognitive function. (PsycINFO Database Record)

Comparison of percutaneous renal biopsy for renal transplantation and native renal biopsy. There are no data comparing percutaneous native renal biopsy (PNB) with percutaneous renal transplant biopsy (PRTB). We present data comparing the diagnostic quality and complications of PNB and PRTB in 132 consecutive patients: 48 PNB and 84 PRTB. The two groups were comparable in demographic characteristics and pretransplant renal biopsy protocol. Biopsy was performed in native kidneys in 42 patients and in allografts in 95. The percutaneous biopsy was performed using the Tru-cut technique and ultrasound guidance. There was no difference in number of biopsies per patient (1.8 vs 1.8, $P = NS$) and success rates (100 vs 97.6%, $P = NS$). The mean core size was greater in PRTB (13 vs 7.7 mm, P

The number of radioactive iodine (RAI) treatments administered to thyroid cancer patients each year has been steadily increasing over the last few years. In the United States, a total of 88,711 patients underwent RAI treatment during the period 1999-2008 (Kutcher, et al., Thyroid Cancer 2008; 12:284-290). Although RAI treatments have been shown to improve survival and control disease, they are accompanied by severe side effects. Side effects include: hypothyroidism, including inappropriate secretion of antidiuretic hormone (ADH), neuropsychological and vascular complications, and carpal tunnel syndrome. Non-cardiac adverse events of RAI treatment include: arrhythmia, hypoparathyroidism and lung fibrosis. Cardiac adverse events include: myocardial damage, hypertension, arterial and valvular calcification, and heart failure. In the United States, RAI treatments are performed under an Investigational Device Exemption (IDE) program in a hospital setting with a dedicated team of physicians and advanced professional nurses trained to administer the treatments. The treatment may require a hospital stay of 5-7 days. Due to the severe nature of RAI treatment, patients treated under the IDE program are carefully screened for suitability for RAI treatment using a battery of screening tests. If the tests are positive, or inconclusive, the patients are referred to a specialized center for RAI treatment. Those patients that undergo RAI treatment are usually hospitalized for the duration of the treatment procedure. In view of the severe nature of RAI treatment, clinicians administering RAI treatments are keen to obtain as many reliable pre- and post-treatment dosimetry measurements as possible. Post-treatment dosimetry may be performed by either a planar or a single-photon emission computed tomography (SPECT) method. In the case of planar measurements, a post-treatment thyroid scan is obtained in the hospital. Planar measurements provide a qualitative (presence/absence) but not quantitative measure of the activity in the thyroid. Quantitative measurements may be performed using an external radiation counter or a well collimated high energy gamma radiation detector. The well collimated high energy gamma radiation detector is placed outside the skin to detect individual x-ray photons directly. The well collimated high
