Q: Breaking lines of code into smaller functions and objects? so I know you are going to hate me for this question, but I am a noob. I am writing a simple yet complex program for a project. I keep coming across this frustration: var template = "{{name}} was born {{birthdate}}, {{course}}" And then I realize I have to have this: var greeting = function () { return template; } The problem is I know I have to include variables in my function and objects, but I am not sure if that's what is happening above. You have to pass a variable into the template. I have this when I call my function: var template = greeting(); //the output of this function is {{name}} was born {{birthdate}}, {{course}}, and not the entire template. So it sounds like in my code (which is condensed and more complicated than what I posted), I have to pass variables in to my function. Is this true? Is there a better way to write this? I need to pass 3 variables into my function. A: Is this true? Is there a better way to write this? Yes. Instead of: var greeting = function () { return template; } You could just do: var template = "{{name}} was born {{birthdate}}, {{course}}, and not the entire template."; var greeting = function() { return template; } But the former is more maintainable, simply because your function does one thing. It doesn't create an object that is a combination of three objects. It just returns a string. Of course, you could rewrite it slightly like: var template = function() { return "{{name}} was born {{birthdate}}, {{course}}, and not the entire template."; } But a template function is rarely needed. Q: How to detect push notifications for a single device? I have an app in the store that allows you to turn the device's screen on or off. When you click an option, it pushes a notification to the device. The problem is that a user is notified of this push in their notifications app and I do not want them to be notified of this push. I was going to use a broadcast, but it needs to be a "single device". So far, I can only think of the possibility of firing a notification in the background. Is there anything that I am missing? A: The only way to do what you want is to poll for the DeviceToken in your app. While you could use a broadcast (or even a local notification) for your own notification you will not be able to deliver a notification directly to the users device (like iOS or Android do). Android's implementation You'll find the DeviceToken using: private String getToken(Context context) { final SharedPreferences prefs = context.getSharedPreferences("registerToken", Context.MODE_PRIVATE); String token = prefs.getString("token", ""); if (!token.isEmpty() &&!token.contains(":")) { token = token + ":" + System.currentTimeMillis(); prefs.edit().putString("token", token).commit(); } return token; } or private String getToken(Context context) { final SharedPreferences prefs = context.getSharedPreferences("registerToken", Context.MODE_PRIVATE); String token = prefs.getString("token", ""); return token; } iOS's implementation You'll find the DeviceToken using: NSUserDefaults *prefs = [NSUserDefaults standardUserDefaults]; [prefs setObject:token forKey:@"DeviceToken"]; [prefs synchronize]; You can then use this token to send push notifications to the device. The only problem I can see with that is that the DeviceToken is never removed from the application's memory, so after you get the token from NSUserDef
