It will give the first public discussion of matters that will be important in future space exploration. We believe that the subject matter discussed is politically sensitive, as the implications for rival nation states, China and Russia, have the potential to affect decision making in any international space race. The topic will be 'Space for Peace' and one of the foremost proponents of the initiative is the former Secretary-General of NATO, Jaap de Hoop Scheffer. Having given a presentation at the IAAS 15th Scientific Symposium in February, he has now accepted the role of IAA Director and will present a long-term vision for how space exploration can help humanity attain its goals of peace. The subject of space for peace covers a wide range of applications that have a direct bearing on nations in conflict. The weapons programmes, nuclear and conventional, of nations with a potential to cause the most harm can be reduced if there is a credible alternative. The use of space in war and in peace is a major application of space. Through missile detection, reconnaissance, targeting, jamming and kinetic effects, satellites are an indispensable tool in both peace and war. If we are to move away from bombs and missiles, better understanding of the effects of war may help us to avoid conflict, whether in the future or in the past. However, the military gains that space offers in precision, reduced cost and better target acquisition may give a potentially dangerous edge. Space also offers more possibilities to improve the existing weapons of war. World peace may be safeguarded by peaceful uses of space, using this knowledge to help maintain world peace and security. Space may be used to influence other nations with less destructive use. It is the role of diplomacy to achieve this. The past approach by certain nations to be 'first' in space and to prevent others from exploring might affect the ability of other nations to solve issues through diplomatic means 570a42141b
