Q: Child div overlaps parent div My question may be hard to understand since it's hard to explain. Here is the jsfiddle with the problem: You can see that I created a span, a link, and a div all in a row. The span is parent. The div is child. The div is bigger then the span. But the span's size is bigger than the div's size. I have some text inside the span, but the text is on the size of the div and it overlaps, therefore the text is on the smaller side of the span. I am using the latest version of firefox, windows 7 and chrom. Is there a way to make the div size the same as the span? A: Remove the padding from .left_container. the padding on the child causes it to grow, which pushes it down and forces it to take up less space. padding: 0px; Incorporation of several enzymatically active proteins into biotinylated liposomes by means of an oriented active layer. To examine oriented incorporation of (enzyme)(n) into biomembranes, we combined oriented immobilization of enzymes with biotinylation of the surface-exposed domains of the liposomes. Incorporation of several enzymes, including the cytosolic, membrane-bound, and cytoskeleton-associated enzymes alkaline phosphatase and beta-glucuronidase, and the exocytosis-inducing enzyme tissue transglutaminase into the interior of the liposomes was achieved. Incorporation of the soluble enzymes was mostly confined to the surface of the liposomes. This proof-of-principle concept was extended by incorporation of a membrane-bound enzyme, the Ca<sup>2+</sup>-activated K+ channel protein SK-C1, and by addition of the biotinylated affinity-tag to the enzyme. The orientation of the anchored proteins within the liposomes was monitored by fluorescent light microscopy. The Avalanche team's 1-0 start to the 2017-2018 season has been followed closely by the "will it hold?" chatter. According to a number of preseason prognosticators, including 1,000.

CNN's Pamela Brown appeared before a House committee this morning to discuss the program. The committee questioned her about both the My Lai massacre and the Sandy Hook shootings, but the bulk of the questioning was about the Matthew Verdon situation. Brown issued her strongest apology yet for the program. "Matthew Verdon is an impassioned man who has some real beliefs and some emotional beliefs and I'm sorry he has those beliefs," Brown said. "I'm sorry for him. I'm sorry for the families in Newtown. I'm sorry for his family because of all the pain they have to endure. I'm sorry for the others who are affected by his outbursts. I deeply regret any pain this episode has caused." Brown went on to say that Verdon "is a very good and talented journalist." She also apologized to Fox News executives who were involved in the decision to air the show. Here's the exchange (that's Brown on the right after the jump): The use of statins may affect normalization of echocardiographic parameters in type 2 diabetics: an observational study. Statins have been reported to improve cardiac function in type 2 diabetics. In contrast, the effect of these drugs on the left ventricular ejection fraction (LVEF) in type 2 diabetics remains controversial. To determine whether the use of statins improves LVEF in type 2 diabetic patients. The study included patients with type 2 diabetes, history of myocardial infarction, and/or coronary artery disease who were receiving statins. They were compared with a control group matched for age, sex, comorbidity, and plasma cholesterol levels. Cardiac function was assessed by echocardiography. Data were analyzed with the Mann-Whitney and chi-square tests. All statistical analyses were performed with the Statistical Package for the Social Sciences (SPSS, version 15.0). The study population included 80 patients with type 2 diabetes. The incidence of statin therapy was significantly higher in the patient group. Patients receiving statins showed a significantly lower age, BMI, cholesterol levels, and presence of diabetic retinopathy (p
