Photoshop is used to produce high-quality, print-ready images (print) or vectors (for online use). In print, it is particularly useful to deliver banner images, Web sites, and logos. While its specialty is print, Photoshop can be used to create images that can be output for the Web or used in print. Both types of output (print or web) require that you convert the layered PDF document into a raster image file (.tif, .tiff, or .bmp) that can be printed. For Web or CD printing, you may also need to convert the layers to a format compatible with your Web page or CD creator. The program can be set up to perform this step automatically, allowing you to skip this step entirely. Photoshop has many plug-ins available for the image editing functions it has to offer, including plug-ins for many drawing programs such as CorelDraw, Adobe Illustrator, and FreeHand. Any plug-in that has Photoshop's functions will have an option to use Photoshop's functions instead of the plug-in's own functions. Although many plug-ins can do much of what Photoshop can do, they often aren't as powerful and flexible. The following sections of this chapter explain how to use Photoshop. Photoshop Elements The latest edition of Photoshop, Photoshop Elements, is a simple and easy-to-use, no-nonsense version of Photoshop. It is primarily designed to provide basic image creation and manipulation with help from the press of a button, but lacks many features found in the full Photoshop. It includes a program for creating Web pages. It can create panoramas and adjust colors for print. It can also do basic image enhancements and provide support for many types of art and other graphic, print, and Web formats. Photoshop Elements is a good choice for users who are just starting with Photoshop and don't require the features found in the full version. The Unbiased Pig The Unbiased Pig is a daily blog focused on US-based sports, primarily hockey and college football. I'm a Washington Capitals fan, having been born in the DC area, but my main interests are hockey in the United States and Canada, and college football. This blog covers news, trends, and a wide range of topics in these areas. Pages Sunday, October 22, 2006 Awards Conference, Week 6 I'm sure many of you know that I've been to two separate awards conferences this season: the Varsity Awards and the Sam Striker Awards. For the Varsity Awards, I decided to go a little unconventional this week and not include my three team votes. I figured I have some more pressing matters on my mind right now, like getting over the flu, and don't want to risk taking a vote to cheat. So here is a revised list of my top five players for each position, team voted.

Defensemen:1. Mike Green (Washington Capitals - LW/C) - While it seems to be a trend, Green tops my list. This game is the perfect time to see who deserves the Norris Trophy this season. Green has five goals and one assist this season and has been the most complete defenseman so far. He's strong along the boards, offensive, he plays as good as any defenseman in the league, and he has great vision.2. Chris Pronger (Philadelphia Flyers - LD/C) - People will argue until the end that Chris Pronger is not the greatest defenseman in the NHL, but I am. He's a true shutdown defenseman who can carry the team. If he's not leading the league in scoring, chances are you know what he's doing while he's on the ice, and when he is killing penalties, the Flyers are an entirely different team. Pronger gets my vote as he has a pair of games of the week and is a threat every time he's on the ice.3. Shayne Gostisbehere (Philadelphia Flyers - LD/C) - I couldn't choose just one Gostibehere's game to select, so I gave him three. I also went with him for this week's Varsity Awards. I love when he plays forward, and he's a complete game-changer, even if he's not a star. He's a pretty solid defender, and the Flyers are in a playoff spot because of him.

VANCOUVER—Former Vancouver park board chair Sarah Kirby-Yung says she's surprised more people aren't talking about the sexual nature of her face to face conference on CBC's The Investigators on Monday. About 300 people showed up for the Sunday event in Vancouver, with 50 extra tickets available for the live broadcast, but Kirby-Yung says the event moved from her home to CBC's studios in New Westminster, B.C., to accommodate the greater crowd. The main topic of conversation during the live event was the coming court case involving Kirby-Yung, former Vancouver city councillor Geoff Meggs and two other men. When it's all over, Kirby-Yung's lawyer is hoping for a negotiated settlement, not a full-on trial. But the topic took a turn on Monday when Kirby-Yung was interviewed by Andrew Chang, host of The Investigators. She said she had asked all four men to reveal what they were doing on their mobile phones but not one of them obliged. Kirby-Yung said it was disappointing they didn't answer her questions. She said she felt there was no question she wasn't entitled to ask because she is the subject of the allegations. "They are not going to answer the question if they are in a sexual relationship (with me)," she said. "But I tried to be a good sport and be nice and they were not nice to me, and in the end I think it's unfortunate that they are not stepping up." Kirby-Yung said she'd planned to tell the court on Monday that all her accusers are untrustworthy. "That is what I would like to be able to share with the court, that they've been untrustworthy from the very beginning. They lied to me, they lied to others. It's never been about getting this outcome. It's about the truth." She said she asked her accusers repeatedly what they were doing on their phones. "They could have blown off the question and said, 'I'm just going to leave the court,' but they didn't." Chang told Kirby-Yung that he was curious why she'd make such a request
