In the early 2000s, a new trend swept the Muslim world. Rather than adhering to the traditional clothes of piety, some women began covering their hair with the hijab, a black shawl that could leave only their eyes uncovered. In conservative settings, men followed suit, draping a long sleeve shirt over their head and drawing their eyes beneath the fabric. In the 2010s, that trend has gained momentum in the West. Some view the practice as a sign of deep cultural identity. Others say it's a symbol of progressiveness, and still others say it represents a person taking on the responsibility of modesty to protect their modesty. The practice of women wearing the hijab is more widespread in Western countries, and a few US states have even considered legislation that would make it illegal for a person to refuse service to a woman whose head is covered. Which way is right? We're probably a lot closer to answering that question now that a new report has come out that suggests the negatives don't outweigh the positives. The study found that women who wear the hijab perform better at school than those who don't. "The evidence shows that wearing a hijab can be a source of empowerment," said Yasmin El Rashidi, the lead researcher of the study. The potential reasons for the positive performance have to do with social norms and gender stereotypes, said Sarah Leproult, the senior author of the report and a psychologist at Indiana University. "[Women who cover their hair] are providing a concrete demonstration of the stereotype that females are less intelligent than males, as well as showing that female brains are much more robust than was previously believed," she said. "I think that women cover their hair to indicate that there is something different, something secretive about themselves, something that keeps them away from the general public," she said. "They can't stand to be in public and have no privacy." Leproult's study of 300 women in Jordan was published in the journal Personality and Individual Differences. She compared the performance of women who covered their heads and those who didn't. There were two different measures of performance: one for standardized tests, and one for actual school performance. Those who covered their heads performed better on both sets of tests than those who didn't. "Those who cover their hair performed

Photoshop brushes at Paint.net Photoshop brushes at Refine by Grand Canyon. Brushes have a series of settings that control the way Photoshop executes brush strokes. By default, the brush settings are set at Medium Hard. Here are the different settings: Pen Pressure: The amount of pressure (pressure) required to complete a stroke. A lower value translates to a brush stroke with a softer brush tip, allowing for a fine line. A higher pressure value yields a harder stroke. Angle: The angle of the brush when applied to the canvas. Tilt: The amount of pressure required to create a two-dimensional stroke when drawing with a pen. Sculpting Pressure: Amount of pressure required to complete a sculpted stroke. Stroke Shape: Graphic strokes or linear designs created with the brush tip. Strokes come in different shapes like the Rectangle, Ellipse, Line, and the Square. Diameter: Size of the brush tip. The larger the diameter, the stronger the point of the stroke. Direction: The direction in which brush strokes travel on the canvas. The direction can be set using a compass or arrows. Rotate: Rotate the brush while drawing. Saturation: Change the color saturation of the brush stroke. Contrast: Change the color contrast of the brush stroke. Opacity: Sets the opacity of the brush stroke. * Once you have some brushes, you can use the brushes menu to easily change their settings: choose More Brushes from the Edit menu, and select the brush you would like to change. at Envato Elements. Many of the effects can be performed with a short series of commands, or with a single click, by selecting one of the preset options within the features panel. For instance, you can use the Eraser tool to erase the entire canvas, or a Grid tool to place a pattern over the entire image. You can also use the Healing tool to replace damaged sections of images. These tools can be found inside the Effects panel: The Gradient tool lets you use the mouse to select a range of colors and distributes them into a new color gradient. You can use this gradient to paint on any selected area of the canvas. The Drop Shadow tool lets you add a series of dappling patterns and shapes to an image. It comes with a wide
