Manufacturing sector is warming up to the idea of additive manufacturing (AM), and for good reason. It enables manufacturers to save on expensive tooling and labor costs, and it enables them to print custom parts right here, right now. Additive manufacturing is also easier than it sounds to do, and it doesn't require the old-school methods of machining and milling. Here's an overview of the process, how it can help industry, and some of the companies getting busy in this area. Advancements in 3D printing technology are constantly ushering in a new form of manufacturing. One such new technology is additive manufacturing, also called 3D printing or rapid prototyping. Additive manufacturing happens when a 3D model is fabricated through the fusion of a number of thin layers of material, much in the same way that a book is made. 3D printing is a simple process, typically done in a 3D printer that moves across a working surface that has layers of powdered, liquid, or granular material. The material and technology used to create 3D models using this technique change, but the most current 3D printing is based on polymer filaments that are made from polymers such as nylon or nylon-like polymers. There are a number of types of 3D printing, and we'll briefly discuss each in turn. Stereolithography, or SLA, is the most common form of 3D printing. This method uses a UV laser or similar source of light to harden liquid or powdered material on a surface; the parts can be quite large, up to hundreds of cubic meters. This method is limited, though, due to the materials used. It is also relatively slow and expensive to implement. There's also the risk of not having enough control over the printing technology to have consistent results. Selective laser sintering (or SLS), which uses a small, focused laser to fuse granular materials together to make objects, is one of the more promising methods. SLS is much faster than traditional 3D printing, and it allows for a wider variety of materials, such as metals, ceramics, and plastics, to be 3D printed. Laser-engineered net shaping, or LENS, is another type of 3D
