most successful strategy used in drug discovery from marine organisms is isolation of a compound(s) of known chemical structure, followed by testing in animal models. To address the challenge of discovery of novel bioactive compounds from marine bioprospecting and from natural resources more generally, proteomics and the proteome are emerging as key tools for the identification of bioactive compounds. To review the state-of-the-art of proteomics and the proteome in marine bioprospecting and the potential for their deployment in drug discovery. Proteomics analyses, mostly protein profiling and protein sequence analyses, have been used to identify putative genes and biochemicals for over a decade. Recent developments in bioinformatics and mass spectrometry, together with the emergence of natural products databases, have brought a number of promising developments. A combination of proteomics with targeted and/or untargeted metabolite profiling may be necessary for identifying novel compounds. Proteomics will contribute to novel drug discovery through in-depth identification of known
