This list is actually pulled in from a remote web service and each item in the list is a paged collection. The user can update the data in the list by pressing a button and calling a web service to update the data. The data on the server side is updated in a distributed fashion by using a worker role to write the data to the database and then a synchronous call to the web service to return the result to the client. My question is, how can I reload the list after the update on the server is complete? A: Instead of calling the remote web service you can call the local service that takes care of the data update. If it is a complex operation you could also have the local web service return some sort of identifier or key to the remote service that would be used to locate the item with the updated data. When the update is completed set the DataContext of the list view to the updated item and call a notification service c9d1549cdd
