There is a very low-level application that initially runs just a core app. In other words, it's strictly CPU bound and determines what operation to run on a data structure. I've no control over that. There is also an application that will "record" some statistics about the performance (which does not even need a UI) and it's provided with the static data structure(to achieve performance independence, events/counting are currently separated). I want to use functions called RecordStats()/StopRecord() (simplified here) Suppose there is a structure with data: {0: 0.1, 1: 0.2, 2: 0.1, 3: 0.2, 4:0.1, 5:0.2} and you want to call RecordStats by passing an int variable: var key = 5; RecordStats.RecordStats(key); Now, as I need to get the key from a list, I must call that array of "if else"s. The performance aspects are like this. Every time RecordStats() is called, the returned results (the precision is not important, so the raw values
