Evaluating a theory of teaching. This is the first empirical evaluation of a theory of teaching derived from the process philosophy of Humberstone and Taylor (1980) and their recommendations for investigating the teaching of calculus. The purpose of the study was to test the theory with regard to course characteristics (undergraduate majors, type of course, instructor's major, instructor's years of teaching calculus) and students' experiences. The mean scores for the nine subscales derived from the theory ranged from.40 to.65. The theorized ability of instructors to satisfy the course-revision criteria of teaching was related to satisfactory class attendance and to course satisfaction. Classroom course scores were correlated with students' evaluations of the course and with overall course evaluations. Findings are discussed in terms of the theory and in relation to a number of issues in the field of education.The present invention relates to a new and distinct cultivar of Digitalis lanata plant, botanically known as
