Our studies address three topics concerning the molecular genetics of eukaryotes: control of gene activity in mammalian cells, characterization of the eucaryotic cell cycle, and the role of chromatin structure in gene activation. (1) Alkylating agents are an important group of anti-neoplastic drugs; however, they also cause unwanted side effects, and so the molecular mechanism(s) by which alkylation lesions block DNA replication in mammalian cells is an area of intense current interest. One approach for identifying key genetic targets of alkylating agents has been the use of classic gene-mutation-screening systems (e.g., drug resistance mutations in adenine phosphoribosyltransferase (APRT), hypoxanthine phosphoribosyltransferase (HPRT), and ornithine decarboxylase (ODC)) (reviewed in (Templeton & Niedzwiecki, 1980)). Based on earlier studies of a mammalian mismatch repair gene-disruption mutator (MMR-d), we have developed the protocol of mitomycin C-induced mutation, MMR gene-disruption mutagenesis. Using our cell lines, human MMR-d-deficient (hMLH1 null) and mouse MMR-d-deficient (mPms2 null) we have found that (a) alkylation-induced block of DNA synthesis in hMLH1 null cells only (but not mPms2 null cells) is strongly suppressed by adenine phosphoribosyltransferase (APRT) mutations; (b) MMR-d-deficient cells are hypersensitive to killing by the topoisomerase-2 inhibitor nogalamycin; and (c) these effects are suppressed by adenine phosphoribosyltransferase mutations, suggesting that MMR-d plays an essential role in the enzymatic repair of alkylation-induced DNA damage. We have initiated a system of forward genetic screening to identify other genes that function in response to this important class of anti-neoplastic drugs. (2) An important aspect of all eukaryotic cells is the normal division of cells into two functionally identical daughter cells. The complexity of this process can be appreciated by noting that it requires a multitude of biochemical reactions, including DNA replication, chromosome separation, nuclear division, chromosome condensation, cytoplasmic division, and the formation of the mitotic spindle. We have
