Formation of biohybrid materials of polyhedral oligomeric silsesquioxanes-bioglass composite in association with stereodeficiency of bioactive glass. The aim of this work is to prepare and characterize biohybrid materials by combining a 3D bioglass with polyhedral oligomeric silsesquioxanes (POSS) as a structure-directing agent in an attempt to obtain hybrid materials with enhanced material properties. Biohybrid materials were prepared by assembling POSS onto bioactive glass (BG) particles in the presence of an organic template, namely, calix[4]arene. SEM micrographs showed the formation of polyhedral oligomeric silsesquioxanes (POSS) particles associated with BG particles. The addition of POSS was confirmed by elemental analysis. The biohybrid composites showed a crystalline structure and high surface area. XRD spectra revealed the crystallization of bioactive glass; however, the presence of silanol groups was found on the surface of bioactive glass after being treated with octadecyl amine. X-ray photoelectron spectroscopy (XPS) analysis showed the presence of Si-O-Si in bioactive glass particles and Si-C and Si-N in POSS-modified bioactive glass after the alkaline treatment. The presence of Si-O-Si, Si-C, and Si-N groups on the surface of bioactive glass was also confirmed by Fourier-transform infrared (FT-IR) spectroscopy. The biospecificity of the biohybrid material was confirmed by the highly negative charge of C=O and negative charge of C-N groups. EAST LANSING, Mich. (AP) -- Jake Butt is giving
