In six adult sheep, we studied the reproducibility of the fluorine dilution method for the determination of the volatile anesthetic requirements of individual sheep. We further compared calculated O2 consumptions with direct measurements of O2 consumption to evaluate the validity of using calculated values. Increasing concentrations of halothane or isoflurane (0.5%-6%) were applied to the sheep. Consecutive blood samples were taken at the same time in all sheep for calculation of apparent steady-state O2 consumption (VO2s), and then for the determination of the fluorine distribution, once after induction of anesthesia and after return to spontaneous respiration. The application of halothane caused a decrease in systemic blood pressure and an increase in heart rate, whereas the application of isoflurane caused a decrease in blood pressure, an increase in heart rate and shivering. The calculated VO2s were significantly higher than the measured VO2s. In conclusion, the calculated VO2s are unreliable estimates of the anesthetic requirements for individual sheep. For the determination of the anesthetic requirements of individual animals, the fluorine dilution method is not suited for anesthesia in critically ill patients or in sheep. The surveillance system for rabies in Madagascar is based on the capture of individual animals (from wildlife and domestic animals) for laboratory testing. Only animals are surveyed, and sampling is proportional to occurrence. To assess the extent of prevalence of rabies in Madagascar, a serological survey was undertaken in a rural district of the southern region of the country. The sample was collected during two years (1995-1996) and included a total of 592 animals. The survey covered animals from 6 different species: cattle, buffalo, sheep and goats, cats and dogs. Altogether, 0.24% of the animals tested had rabies specific antibodies. The species-specific prevalence of rabies varied between 0% and 25.88%. No statistical analysis was undertaken due to the small sample sizes per species. It is concluded that the system for rabies surveillance in Madagascar needs to be re-evaluated with regard to the species-specificity of the surveillance. New York (CNN Business) Former President Barack Obama, Hillary Clinton and other Democratic presidential candidates have been coy when asked about whether the next president should appoint the next Supreme Court justice. But the advice that both of them have offered to their successors is clear: Choose someone who will protect the access to reproductive health care that underpins the women's rights movement, and who won't gut protections for transgender people. Clinton — as she did during her book tour and a televised interview with NBC's Cynthia McFadden — suggested that if the next president doesn't appoint someone of her caliber, it's hard to imagine a single president at the top of the ticket going forward. "You need someone who is on the court who understands you know, the history of the court, who has the respect Triclinium Triclinium was a Roman term for an umbrella-shaped dining couches made in the form of three rings. One of these was set in the centre of the tent, and two on either side; these latter were raised a little above the table, and were called 'pedestals'. The middle ring was also called 'pedestal'. It derived its name from the shape in which it was set; the ring beneath it was similarly called 'middle ring'. Examples A more complex example is in a painting in the Church of San Francesco di Sales, Brescia, depicting a scene from the life of St Francis of Sales, the Bishop of Geneva. It shows three triclinia side by side, with a fourth in the background. On all of these the table was elevated above the floor by the addition of an additional step. Between the three side tables is a single central table, around which the viewers would sit, and upon which the participants at each table would eat. Tricliniums are also found in ancient Roman villas, where they were usually on the ground floor, and acted as refreshment areas for the owners of the villa when they were guests there. The centre table would be covered by a tablecloth, while the side tables would be left open to enable diners to eat more freely. History Tricliniums were first used as spaces to sit and eat meals in the Romano-Celtic villages. In the 4th century BC (
