Intervals Ortho Game introduced me to the concept of game intervals. I quite enjoy the thought. Enforced by the rules themselves, you are unsure about what could be hidden behind the next wall of the house; lined up against you with a different and new game challenge. The image above was framed by another participant at a recent game jam for two. This is mainly my idea of clashing the aisles of moving cards from Color Coded Intervals. Despite the large number of moves some of you would be making during the game, movements are limited to only two moves. One of those moves starts the card onto it's new track. The second move lays the card at the end of its track. The game is whole based on the color of the track. Starting as a green card, it becomes, when along its journey through the board, white and then changing colour to yellow along the way before ending at a red turn. The turn itself says whether you are making a brown or a purple turn. Your turn ends when you are dealt with or provided a sit down signal. This card is reversed for it's final turn to color in along the other side of the board. It's interesting to think about this and when would you make this happen with a landmine or a bomb. Beginning to see the design, a design, that is not quite under the logo, but running with it… Such a first moving card to take on the board should have a requirement to signal-in with the required maneuver, rather than randomly move around the board. For example: one of the two browns on the strategy board are already moved and takes the no signal move of one of the green cards. There is only one brown left when the green cards are dealt out last. The cards are dealt face down and the game consists of four players. The remaining three players draw cards and continue dealing cards until one player runs out of cards. During their turn, they may take any number of cards from the top card of their hand. Cards are then turned face up and a signal is passed back. It is still possible for a player to make a wrong maneuver but to do this, then the player must pay the opposing player a yellow move after each wrong move. There is an award for the player that keeps correct moves for longest total running time (turns). This is not just interesting exercise in cards and board design.
