moreCalponin is not an intermediate filament of chemically transformed rat hepatocytes: studies with two monoclonal antibodies. A previously described monoclonal antibody was used to study the expression of calponin in chemically transformed rat hepatocytes. The rat clone 9F12, which recognises an epitope in the NH₂-terminal domain of calponin, reacted with untransformed hepatocytes and with hepatic Golgi apparatus. However, staining of transformed hepatocytes with this antibody was inhibited by pretreatment of the cells with both 3-methylcholanthrene and phorbol ester, a transformation-associated effect. In contrast, the same antibody stained transformed cells in the absence of chemical treatment. This treatment was accompanied by the loss of intermediate filament proteins and an increase in the levels of beta-tubulin. In both untransformed and transformed cells, the distribution of calponin was similar to that of intermediate filament protein. Thus, the results presented in this paper indicate that chemically transformed rat hepatocytes do not express calponin. These observations point to a new role for this protein in cell transformation.

The so-called "click" revolution in transition-state stereochemistry in the class of compounds to which the present invention pertains has dominated the chemistry of organosilanes. In both thermal reactions and catalytic reactions such as nucleophilic substitution reactions, the attachment of various functional groups to an organic hydrocarbon substituent is of considerable commercial interest. The former are useful for modifying the properties of a hydrocarbon chain to give bio-filtration and photochemical products. The latter are useful for synthesis of biologically important molecules. The field of organosilanes has been a leading contributor to functional group chemistry. Chalcogens present in organosilanes are π -donors. The heteroatom is located equatorial to the silicon atom

Roll the Dice Saturday, May 2, 2011 This past summer, Tony and I attended our fourth year of OSAGE FEST (Ohio Renaissance Festival). The memories of last year have been replaced by fondness as we both found the time to attend this fantastic and relaxing event. This year was filled with many highlights and downsides that Tony and I can happily share. First and foremost, we can report that the heat was incredible all-year long. As an avid desert dweller who's spent many a weekend in the Colorado Rockies, I can safely say that Ohio was extremely warm. In most places, the temperature would be high in the 70s and low in the 50s at night. This was comparable to the hottest days we experienced in other northern cities. One week in July, the temperature was even in the 90s and we needed to pack an air-conditioner. The relentless heat also made organization a big issue for us; we drove to the event on Ohio highways for about 140 miles one way. We chose that weekend because the weather was hotter (upper 80s) than the next forecasted weekend (upper 70s). That said, we were so happy to be there! This year, the weather wasn't exactly their best though; the wind and rain flooded the grounds several times. We checked the weather every half hour to see if a storm was coming. At one point, I was lying on my back strolling through the oasis area because I thought the cold wind was more tolerable than the stagnant heat. But then the wind pushed me from the shelter of a tent and picked me up like a rag doll. I got pitched into a rain barrel where I was soaking wet when the storm passed. Tony eventually found me and dragged me safely to the stage. At my age, I don't want to complain of a lack of energy anymore. Still, there were far more events that were "let-down" moments for me, than were simply pleasant memories. Those "let-downs" kept me from experiencing a level of satisfaction that I really wanted that I felt last year. I am vague and wish to leave that out of this summary, but last year, I enjoyed myself. This year, I spent some "quality" time with our daughter, but the rest of the time, I spent the least amount possible. I was disappointed that I was less focused on experiencing historical recreations of normalcy and more focused on consuming the overpriced "cool
