Levels Adjusting an image's color levels (see Figure 9-1) is the first step in adjusting a photo's color. Figure 9-1 shows how to adjust the Levels tool. Figure 9-1. Use the Levels tool to adjust the color levels of an image. If something looks out of place, it might be because the image's exposure or color balance is off. The Levels tool offers several different options, including _Auto,_ for adjusting the image's overall brightness, hue, or luminance, _Lightness,_ for adjusting the image's lightness, and _Saturation,_ for adjusting its color saturation. Adjusting the luminance of an image affects the overall appearance of the photo. If the image was shot at a higher light level than its surroundings, you'll need to use the Auto button to correct the image's brightness to match. You can adjust the RGB channels or a single HSL channel independently to adjust color saturation or hue. When you click the button next to the individual channel in the Layers panel, the highlighted channel will appear in the Layers panel. You can adjust its brightness, hue, and saturation by moving the sliders. Here are some things to keep in mind as you adjust the Levels tool: **Clipping**. Use the Levels panel to clip an image to help fix problems with uneven exposure. Unlike Curves, Levels doesn't allow you to clip while adjusting the colors. **Importance**. You can quickly change the image's importance when working with multiple layers, so be careful to set it back to its original importance as you finish editing it. **Hint**. You can adjust some of Photoshop's settings with the Hint drop-down menu. These include the image

The most impressive accomplishments of those who build civilizations are a proof of their power, but they also want to be virtuous and they believe in moderation. They also believe in the law of permanence. That is why they build cities with walls; they do not change from city to city, they are their city. Thus, the entire history of man, too, is reduced to a selection, but with a difference. In the case of cities and states, it is a matter of time: they were created in time. Man has built cities and states for well over two thousand years. The different civilizations, too, are of such duration. Each has its own distinct structure, its own culture, its own language, and its own laws; each is distinguished by its own special way of life. But this difference is not genetic: it cannot be reduced to a choice. Each type of civilization is an expression of the power of its builders. The difference between the Chinese and the Indians, for instance, is much greater than the difference between China and India. Only in that which does not matter for the succession does each of these civilizations choose its successors. That is why ancient China and ancient India, over two thousand years ago, chose very similar successors. And even before this had happened, the first structures of cities and states were created, and at that time there was the same difference between the first one and the second one. And for a thousand years after the first civilization was built, there was once again the same difference between the first city and the second one. And then all the differences that can be traced back from the origin of civilization and have to do with power vanished, were lost. History, which had a different shape before, was traced back to its origin in common structures, in the same form. Is that the case for history, too, which, according to the view of those who are pedantic, is not an event but a process? And if so, it is a boring process. Why so? Because most people want to be part of a history that is interesting. They want to feel that someone once spoke in their own language and at their own time. And the older a language is, the more important it is for the history of that language. Most people are wrong. What language do they speak now? Hindi? Urdu? English? What about it? Is it not the case that all these countries—India, Pakistan, and Bangladesh—have one language in common,
