The perception of gravity and the weightlessness syndrome. In a group of 81 patients with the weightlessness syndrome (WLS) the criterion of a decrease in the gain of body mass was used to define the gravity perception. In the whole group (n = 81) all 17 patients with a negative criterion of gravity perception were in a state of negative inertia and achieved a correct perception of gravity. In the 50 patients who came to medical observation as a result of a space accident the criterion of a decrease of the gain of body mass was not fulfilled in 21 cases (42% of all patients). In all cases of a negative criterion of gravity perception and in nine of the 21 (42%) patients without a negative criterion, isometric tests of the limbs' muscles showed a state of negative inertia similar to that in patients with a negative criterion of the perception of gravity. In this group of 21 patients a partial alleviation of the sense of weightlessness was observed after a short-term rehabilitation of the brain in 13 cases. In the abovementioned nine patients the positive criterion was fulfilled after an intensive rehabilitation process of the brain.
