crash, police said. After police were told that the man was passed out, they approached and asked him to exit the vehicle, according to a news release from the Salt Lake City Police Department. The man started to walk away, but was later stopped and arrested after officers determined that he was driving under the influence. The officer who responded was in the area of 200 South and 200 East and was in a marked squad car. Video from the scene shows a police officer respond to the area. The officer approached the stopped vehicle and approached the driver. He was not immediately struck and apparently passed the officer. The video shows the two men having a conversation, and the officer can be seen walking back to his squad car after the two men left the area. Police said the driver was headed toward the University of Utah and East High School. The department described the driver as a white male between the ages of 22 and 27. He has red hair and was wearing a black winter hat. He was also wearing a beige short-sleeved shirt, tan pants and a black coat. Anyone with information about the crash can contact Salt Lake City police at 801-799-3000.Q: How to control two motors at the same time? Hi fellow Arduino users. I have been trying to build a food dispenser that has two functions (Supply milk, so you can do cartwheels in the living room :D) I have a 2mm servo that will control the jet to move forwards and backwards

For another build issue you can take a look at this thread : . Get up and go: Margot Oskam interview Ben Horowitz and co-founder of the leading private fund Andreessen Horowitz, come on board as guests at our very first London office. Take a minute to find out how they work and what you can expect to see as a new startup in the city. They are the people who bring it all to life. The portfolio investors, the architect, the PR people. The geeks. They are the ones who do all the work behind the scenes. Andreessen Horowitz, as their name suggests, is a highly successful venture capital firm, and the firm's consultants are the ones who help companies to stay afloat and grow. In their previous location of Mountain View, they had more than 300 staff. While their new London office has a lower level of staff, we can expect that it will be a similar company. What does this mean to the startups? That we have the best set of investors in the country, amongst best, and the further away you are from the heart of the London tech scene, the more of a premium you pay for it. Ben Horowitz is the most interesting of the bunch, having left an extraordinary position in his family's company at AOL and Virgin to join Andreessen Horowitz. Originally based in Palo Alto, Horowitz is one of the most highly touted tech investors in the world and has been involved with a number of companies such as Netscape, Tonic, Sun Microsystems, and Google. At AOL he took a huge hit in 2001 as the Bubble burst and the company was sold for a small fraction of its value. He also joined Barnes & Noble in an attempt to revive the company, but he left after running it for one week. At Andreessen Horowitz he started as a general partner and also worked on a number of investment decisions. In June he became the CEO of the company. Before that he took in a fellow named Eric Holder who is the investor, entrepreneur and advisor. He also has the titles of Chief Scientist and Executive Vice President. I asked the duo if they are still very involved with the startups. Horowitz said that he cannot play the startup game. He has plenty to keep him busy and energized with his other business ventures.

From the PCS-750 to the Atari 2600, we've lost many a favorite console. Looking to lighten the load, we've compiled a list of the machines that will never live in the world again. They'll be missed, but they'll live in the hearts of users who shared their favorite pastime with their friends and loved ones. And, to be fair, a few of these are very special machines that we're going to talk about as the days go on. Mass Effect A gorgeous game. A kickass game. And now it's gone. Thanks to the exploding Wii U, the game that popularized the use of the "control pad" is dead. R-Type Take-Two's great arcade shooter R-Type was the first (and, until the Game Boy Advance, only) game to allow you to use the control pad to turn. No longer. X-Wing Fighter When LucasArts released Star Wars X-Wing, the game picked up a lot of flak. Many people, myself included, didn't like the snazzy new game. The snazzy new game was huge; it used the new proprietary X-Wing game engine instead of the old TIE fighter engine. And, as a result, the game was a huge hit. Then, one day in 2009, LucasArts announced that X-Wing would be re-released on the PC. The game only had two versions of the game. The traditional X-Wing, which lets you play with six TIE fighters. Or you could play with X-Wings, which allows you to play with nine TIE fighters. With the impending release of the final game in the trilogy, you could pick up the second game in the game's history and pick up the nine-ship version for $15. The game that took
