Download: Lee has addressed the recent controversy about his fellow Facebook and Google employees issuing a press release criticising the Hong Kong protests, declaring that he is "not working for Google" while other employees have "no problem working there," it was reported on Wednesday. In the event Lee hadn't directly disavowed these remarks, he did, in a much more forthright manner, that he hasn't made any public statements and that there is no plan to. The small number of people who know about this - i.e. all of us - probably know it already. But it's worth reiterating. In no way am I justifying the occupation by saying anything else. I've said my view is entirely opposite, that I support the Hong Kong government and their objection to the protests. I'm not surprised at Google's statement. I have no problem working there. Charlie Lee So why is it that Lee is today being accused by Richard Gantz, a former CEO of PayPal and perhaps the creator of the Fast Company's "Faces of Innovation", of misrepresenting himself. It went on to say that some children of low-SES and lower-IQ parents generally did not respond well to the computerized test, and also that some parents, even if able to provide their children with a computer, were unable to do so. Also, the committee noted that the computer program did not seem to work on some computers, and it wanted to make sure that some method would be available for parents who did not have computers for their children. What's new in My Way VR:

* venoms were found to be highly toxic after subcutaneous injection in mice and exhibited similar mortality rates as that of the A. aurantii scorpion venom after subcutaneous injection. When injected intramuscularly, the scorpion venom did not cause LDH release or protection of mice against the lethality induced by Aplastia venom.^[@ref44],[@ref45]^ Kiric et al.^[@ref46]^ analyzed A. australis scorpion venom and described that A. australis venom was considerably different from A. litoralis venom due to the presence of a metal ion in the reduced form of the PLA-2~ protein, which might have caused inhibition of proteolytic activity in the venom. Venoms are said to have evolved from a body defense mechanism to an offensive form.^[@ref47]^ Although the scorpion venom injection site is generally much less lethal than the injection site for snake venom, scorpion venom has high affinity to bind to many organs of the body.^[@ref48]^ This property of scorpion envenomation leads to the increase in deaths caused by scorpion sting not only because of the toxicity of the venom and the possibility of acute or chronic venom-induced toxemia, but also because of a delay in the victim's appearance at a medical facility and the time required to apply a drug or antidote.^[@ref49]^ Table 3[#{@tbl3}{ref-type="other"}] shows and compares these conditions of other venomous animal bites.^[@ref50]-[@ref53]^
