Damn, You Almost Slept on It! The other day, I was sitting down, reviewing all the albums I've ever bought or downloaded, and all the concerts I've ever attended. It came up to over 250 albums and more than 140 gigs. This is all in my brain, of course, so you can imagine how hard it was to keep up. I think this is a good time to make some changes. I'm putting it into three categories: Software Music History Software Of course, there's always been software we could use. The bottom line with all of it is: The best software programs are free. For example, AfterEffects, Compressor, CineAlign, and KeyNote all have free versions. For people who would like to create DVD-rip discs and put them on DVD's: Nero isn't free, but you can use Free DVD Creator or iTunes to rip DVDs and burn them. You could use DVD Creator to burn a disc for free to create a demonstration disc so that you can find out how DVD Creator works before you pay for the DVD-Maker that will really help you. For people who are trying to record the audio from their video game consoles, you want to use the free sound recorder option in Windows. If you're downloading music or downloading a movie, you want to use BitTorrent. If you're producing your own video, you could use Windows Movie Maker which is free, or you could use free, robust video editing software such as iMovie, Windows Movie Maker, and RealPlayer. For the benefit of people who don't use computers, I've included a list of software programs that are meant to work on computer. Some of them may not work, others are pretty cool. You should take a look at some of them. For example, if you want to create artwork, you could use InDesign, Adobe Photoshop, Painter, and Photoshop Album. You could also use Audition to create voice-overs, and iMovie is meant for creating trailers, demonstrations, and short movies. This software exists as long as people like you keep making them. But you can download them for free. Music You've probably heard a lot about MP3s. The short answer is that they're a compressed version of music that saves space on your computer or music player. It's a good thing to do. When I was young, I used to download and save music from Napster and
