A: You can use the `diff` module, which has a function called `unified_diff.diff_cleanup_holes(left, right)`. It has the same effect as what you described, but is a lot easier to use. I posted a code sample using this module a couple of days ago. It's in the Read the Docs Python Cookbook. It's the only recipe using the `diff` module for me. A: Standard approach to getting a unified diff is to do something like the following: `lines = []` for line in original: `differed = diff.diff_bytes(line, new_line)` `lines.append(''.join(differed))` You could then process the lines or even turn them into a string representation of some kind. Note that you might run into problems if the diff contains backslashes that appear in the original/new text; I haven't thought it all the way through.

Collaborative international nutritional research for South Africa. High levels of poverty and malnutrition are both widespread in South Africa, particularly amongst the low-income, urban, black population. The South African Food Composition Table is not complete, and few reliable data are available on the actual nutrient intake of the South African population. This paper describes briefly the concept of collaborative international nutritional research for South Africa and its potential impact in support of the national nutritional programme. Despite the lack of readily available reliable data and scientific data there is a need to perform a baseline assessment of the status of nutritional intakes and lifestyles and assess the implications of this information in the development of nutrition policies and programmes. This invention relates to improvements in insulated, self-cooling-aiding food containers and more particularly to a food package with an integral, flexible liner and an insulating barrier disposed within the insulating liner and upon which food is adapted to be supported. Food, particularly hot food, is prepared in a wide variety of ways and is often served in a container that has insulating characteristics and is kept hot during service for a period of time. After service, the container is removed, emptied and is cleaned. It is often impractical to clean a hot container and return it to the kitchen of the establishment where the food is prepared. In many of the instances, the container is not cleaned at all and is discarded. A variety of insulated containers have been devised to accommodate several different types of food products. Some
