Failure modes and effects analysis: application to a fuel cell vent test protocol. This paper describes the application of the fundamental principals of failure modes and effects analysis (FMEA) to design and implement a protocol for testing fuel cell components. Reliability is a key advantage of solid oxide fuel cells. During their lifetime, the components in the cells can become defective, and may fail to perform as expected. These defects may in turn, lead to degraded fuel cell performance and, ultimately, to safety or fire hazards. The reliability objective of this study is to quantify the reliability of the fuel cell system by identifying failure modes and the severity of those failure modes. The protocol would be the interface between the reliability requirements of the regulatory agency and the high-reliability requirements of the fuel cell system. The application of FMEA methodology leads to the identification of a number of key failure modes. The formulation of the protocol is described. The application of the protocol to an operating fuel cell system produces failure rates for each failure mode which are used to determine the minimum "operating duration" of the components for which the failure rate is equal to the acceptable failure rate, the failure rate limit. A detailed discussion of the reliability methodology and results is presented.Q: Transfering Java application to C++ I have an application that is written in Java and I am having trouble finding a way to port this application to a new game I am working on. What is the best approach for doing this? A: You should be able to use a Java library in C++. For a tutorial of how to do that check this link: As far as the interface you will probably have to write your own C++ library (can do this with Boost or libstdc++), and make your Java application be able to use that library. It's not something that is going to happen out of the box. What's New In?

: Never ask a woman if she is going to replace her tampon. She will be busy complaining about the pain of an unplanned period in the future. B: Not to ask any kind of 'first date question'. Many women feel like there is something horrifying and invasive about asking about where they are in their cycle. They should already know what their due date is so it's not like they have to make a guess. C: Don't ask a woman how far along she is in her pregnancy. She will be horrified that you didn't know she was pregnant. And no matter how much you explain you're not a doctor, you don't care, you don't know what you're talking about, she will be sure to remind you anyway. D: Never ask someone how far along they are in their pregnancy. The patient can feel like they have to explain the baby isn't even a baby yet. E: Never ask a woman if she has reached menopause. Menopausal women are afraid it will give them cancer. And you're like, 'you're still going to have periods'. F: Never ask a woman if she is on the pill. She will feel like she has to explain the whole 'we don't want to have sex, because I have to use a condom, it just feels wrong' thing again. G: Unless your girlfriend is actually having a miscarriage, which is a big deal and something you should try to catch, don't ask her if she is going to miscarry. She will be really offended that you didn't already know. H: Don't ask a pregnant woman how far along she is in her pregnancy. She will love it, and you will be forced to acknowledge how hard it is for her to be pregnant. I: Never ask a pregnant woman what stage of pregnancy she is. She'll be happy to tell you she's 9 months pregnant, but you will feel like you're a moron. J: Don't ask a woman about her actual due date, she will be a wreck because she thinks you're going to fire her if she's late K: Don't ask a pregnant woman how far along she is in her pregnancy. She will be happy to tell you how far she is, but you will be a racist. L: Don't ask a woman how much she is going to have to pay for a doctor's visit. If you
