The present work explores the concept of "Pigiron" which is a combination of fermentation with an aerobic and an anaerobic post-fermentation step in order to minimize the undesirable metabolic outcomes of fermentation. The rationale behind the concept is to harness the potential of the pig iron present in the post-fermentation broth as a result of anaerobic metabolism and oxygen utilization by the inoculated culture. A bench-scale study was conducted using (ligno)cellulosic feedstocks (wheat straw, Poplar chips) and the pretreatment step involved was hydrothermal pre-treatment under pressure of 7.5 MPa and temperature 200°C. The pretreated materials were then fed to a fully mixed anaerobic batch fermentation process using Saccharomyces cerevisiae INVSc1 as the microorganism with an H_2/CO_2 atmosphere of 0.4, 0.8, 1.6 and 2.2. The main objective was to achieve a low furfural yield from the acetate-derived metabolites of the pretreatment process; the small size of the post fermentation reactor ensured thorough mixing leading to inhibition of metabolic outcomes of the fermentation. Cell viability remained fairly constant, but the saccharification efficiency was found to be inversely related to furfural yield, thus indicating that fermentation alone was not sufficient in completely degrading all the lignocellulosic material. The yield of all furfural decreased significantly under combined cultivation
