SolidWorks Premium 2013 SP0.The goal of this proposal is to combine structural and functional insights into the membrane-associated heat shock protein Hsp70. The advantage of using the model system yeast Saccharomyces cerevisiae is that all of the genes coding for the major Hsp70's (i.e., Ssa1/2 and Ssb1/2) have been cloned and characterized, making it a useful system for the testing of the specific functions of these various chaperones. The first specific aim of the study is to determine the mechanisms of cochaperone activation and binding of ATP by yeast Hsp70's and to determine the details of chaperone-substrate interactions. These studies will include the effects of inhibitors of chaperone activity, mutations of the ATP binding site, analysis of the role of catalytic residues, and studies on the requirements of ATP binding and hydrolysis. The second specific aim is to determine whether the two yeast Hsp70's, Ssa1 and Ssb1, act primarily as cochaperones or as assembly factors in vivo. Genetic approaches will be used to test whether the highly conserved Glu-X-X-Glu motif of the lid region is needed for cochaperone function, and whether cochaperone activity is required for substrate release by the chaperones. The third specific aim is to determine whether the cochaperone activity of the yeast Hsp70's and their requirement for accessory proteins are conserved in procaryotes and eukaryotes, and to test whether they function in a similar manner in either system. The results of these studies are likely to be relevant for the understanding of Hsp70's in higher eukaryotes as well as the mechanisms of signal transduction by the heat shock stress response system.Electrical
