The headlamps were burned out, so I replaced them with a pair of Recaro headlamps that I replaced the bulbs with some new ones. I also replaced the DRL bulbs with new ones. Now I have a problem with the HVAC buttons on the dimmer switches. I have gotten it to where the headlamps dim just fine. However, I want the climate control to be dim as well.

Super Contra (arcade) Contra 3: The.I've been playing around with a technique that I've been planning on using in a different project. It works well enough that I'm going to use it in a small scratch project. It requires a bit of planning and does require the ability to use artboards and text fields. The technique is to clone an element and apply a dynamic style to a clone. This code sets up the cloning. The style of the cloned element is set using a normal style object. When the element is clicked you set the static style of the element and then the element is cloned. All of the original style is copied to the cloned element. Then the cloned elements are put into a layer. Then the cloning is repeated and so on. As the layer count increases the view count also increases. I found that adding clones to the layer would be a major performance hit and that performance was just fine. This is my latest version of the code. The code is really three functions. The processClone function is called by a timer that fires once every second. The processClone function clones a random element from the layer and applies a unique style. The changeStyle function clones the current element then sets its style to a clone of that style. The result is the need to add a few variables to the controller. These are the layer and views of the current layer. The clicks and the layer of the clicked element are needed as well. The only issue I have is that I can only clone the current element. I wanted to be able to clone any element. I tried to adapt an idea from UITapGestureRecognizer
