An oak tree fell on a horse that broke free of the steers and they were brought in dead, the mortally wounded steers screaming out their pain as they were pierced with arrows. The Indians, aroused from their slumber, appeared out of nowhere with fire arrows and scalping knives. Men and women screamed in the bitter cold as they ran for their lives. Jonny's mama ran. She was a bright, lovely lady, who always wore her hair in dozens of braids that cascaded down her back. She ran like a deer with eyes of ice and a heart of fire. Jonathan, never slow, was there, at her side, fearless of the flames, terrorized by the fearlessness of the Indians who followed her, who never quit chasing her all night and all the next day. Those who came after her were not foolhardy enough to run in full pursuit of her. "Jonny!" she shouted, through a mouth full of blood. "Mama! Look out!" His mother ran. She jumped a ditch, fell, and was gone. The Indian who had chased her ran to a hole at the edge of a field and when he peered in, he saw the body of his brother-in-law. -coloured lake A 42-year-old woman wades up to her hips in a dark, still lake 1,500km outside Beijing, searching for her 36-year-old daughter – but finds only her clothes and a white plastic bag These are bleak times for Huang Haiying, 42, as she wanders through a dun-coloured landscape, searching for her lost daughter. On the morning of May 29 this year, Huang had just finished work at a wholesale company, when her neighbour told her that her daughter, Yu Xiaomeng, 36, was missing from her home in the village of Wokchang, in Liaoning province, some 1,500km north-east of the Chinese capital. According to the neighbour, officers from the local police had arrived at Yu Xiaomeng's house, accompanied by the village head and two wooden poles roughly the size of ladders. The poles were tipped by soldiers wearing grey berets, as they mapped out the perimeter of the village. "They looked very suspicious," Huang told me at her home in Helong, in the neighbouring Hubei province. "I just thought they must be from the army, not the police. But I said nothing and went over to the houses." Huang had never seen a Red Army – local paramilitary police/assassins – patrol before. "They were guarding all the houses in our village, asking if anyone knew about a missing person. If we didn't they would use their swords, or kill us!" Luckily, Huang's younger sister-in-law had talked to the neighbours, and she knew where the missing woman was staying. "We found Yu Xiaomeng first thing in the morning, under the netting of the window," said Huang, who has three children and four grandchildren, three of them under six. "But she was a mess. I saw that her pockets had been turned inside out and one of them was cut all the way. She was cold – that's how I knew she was dead." According to Li Penglai, head of the Red Army's Liaoning brigades, this is not uncommon. "For many years people have been running away, trying to take their own lives," he told me. "We try to save them, but sometimes they can't be saved. That's a problem." Last year there were 2,183 suicides in China, a rise of 20% over 2013 and a disturbing
