In addition to these formats, a retail version is planned for the Nintendo Wii U. -A6 motorway (Netherlands) The A6 motorway (formerly the A47 motorway) is the northernmost motorway in the Netherlands. It connects the city of Eindhoven with the city of Roermond via junction 14, close to the German border. The route offers an alternative to the German Autobahn 7 via the A50 near Moerdijk. The road was previously known as the N623 highway. This was before the reorganisation of the national road numbering system in 2003 when the European route E34 was being planned. The link is the shortest route between Rotterdam and Germany. History In 1989, work on the trunk road started between the German border near Woensdrecht and the interchange at Roermond. The route was built mostly to a provincial road standard. In 1996, the eastern part from the Belgian border to Roermond was finished, while the western part from the Belgian border to Eindhoven was to be completed at the end of 1999. The project was split in two in order to make it politically possible. As a result, the Western portion was shortened by several kilometers to the Dutch-Belgian border near Woensdrecht, while the Eastern portion was shortened by several kilometers to the Belgian border near Gemert-Bakel. In 2000, the northern terminus was moved from the border of the Canton of Roermond and the adjoining German Province of North Rhine-Westphalia at the Ruhr Valley towards the German town of Roermond. The final section, for about 10 km from the German border at Woensdrecht to the Belgian border, was built as a tunnel. In addition, the bypass of Molenbeek near the German-Dutch border was built at the Belgian border. In 2009, the Belgian city of Antwerp was connected with the N623. After the opening of the route in September 2000, the route took on the name of the A47 motorway. The opening of the route created a d41b202975
