Sacksonville, Baltimore Sacksonville is a neighborhood in the city of Baltimore, Maryland. According to the US Census Bureau, the neighborhood has a total population of 2,252 (as of 2010). History The neighborhood was named for Col. Robert Henry William Sackson, a landowner in the area. The area was originally an African-American community called Safe River, after the nearby Safe River Race Track, now a part of the Central Branch of the Baltimore City Public Schools. In the early 20th century, however, the area became integrated, when new homes were built for African Americans. Sacksonville was developed in the 1930s by the Baltimore Gas & Electric Company to house company workers in segregated facilities. The area was named for Col. Robert Henry William Sackson, a landowner in the area and the first Superintendent of the Central Branch of the Baltimore City Public Schools. Although the neighborhood was originally intended for public school students from segregated Baltimore City Schools, many of the new residents were African American. After World War II, the housing in the area gradually deteriorated and residents decided to use the DCR property as a community development in the late 1950s. The neighborhood was once known for sports in the '50
