HEX: Payday 2™ }20 thoughts on “lota coders have a special spot in their hearts for fibre” My sig is from, what seems like, yesterday; it was submitted in response to the request to name your favorite particle in the Iota Community, but I wasn’t aware of this post, which was published the day I posted my response. I’m guessing when someone has asked you to tell them what your favorite particle is, it automatically means it’s the one that stands for “favourite”, or “special”, and it seems the Iota community does have a special place in their hearts for fibres. ? “Intro: The Iota Network, a distributed network securing transaction verification” — I often have to explain this to people who ask me what the Iota network is. It’s one thing for people to understand the need to secure transactions, but quite another to understand the concept of decentralization, where each part of the network has an equal say in the transaction process. The big challenge is to make this concept comprehensible to non-technical people while staying true to the technical details. The reward mechanism is critical in making sure that transaction verification can be decentralized It may not make much sense why I just spent the last two days writing about the Iota network, but I wonder whether I may have sparked some interest in the concept. If I do, I’d love to read your thoughts on the subject — and I think you did a wonderful job of explaining the concept in this post, which I just got reading. The reason why I’d like to elaborate a bit is because I feel the message I was trying to send is being lost in translation, even though the explanation is perfectly clear to the reader. In the “Intro”, I am trying to explain why the Iota network needs a reward mechanism. That is, why the protocol requires a transaction mechanism, why it cannot work without one. And that is an essential part of understanding the technical details of the Iota network. “The Iota Network” is critical to understanding
