. .Fibrosing mediastinitis complicated by tracheoesophageal fistula. Mediastinitis is a life-threatening complication of head and neck infection. Chronic involvement, leading to fibrosis, may occur after radiation and/or infection. We report a case of mediastinitis associated with tracheoesophageal fistula after radiation therapy of a thyroid carcinoma. The patient developed an increasing "breathlessness" but no other symptoms indicating mediastinitis. Tracheal intubation enabled us to diagnose a benign lesion with tracheoesophageal fistula by computed tomography (CT) and two-dimensional echocardiography (2D-Echo). Surgical exploration and debridement revealed fibrosing mediastinitis with tracheoesophageal fistula, and a limited cervicotomy was performed to avoid general anesthesia and further surgery. The postoperative day, the patients died of multiple organ failure. The patient died of exsanguination due to tracheoesophageal fistula. Mediastinal fibrosis may cause serious complications. Immediate diagnosis is important and early surgery is essential to control infection, reduce the mediastinal necrosis, and inhibit further secondary infection.
