The permeability of the placenta to various compounds was studied in rats in utero and after birth. Antilymphocytic serum was given to rats intraperitoneally to block MHC immune reactivity in the females on days 7 and 8 of gestation and day 1 of birth. It was found that all compounds cross the placenta regardless of whether the compounds are haptens or large peptides. Methylnitrosourea, which is excreted in the newborn with an insignificant enterohepatic circulation, crosses the placenta and can be found in the fetus 4 days after administration of the drug. Since the presence of drugs in the fetus seems to be important for the teratogenic effects seen with drugs that cross the placenta, studies of the placental barrier to drugs are important. Metal-organic framework based on metal-organic framework nanoparticles and nanorods: high and rapid gas separation performance. A stable and stable product can be obtained by the reaction between zinc acetate and o-phenanthroline (ZnO-Phe) nanoparticles and nanorods respectively in the absence of solvent. The obtained ZnO-Phe composites showed a high and rapid gas separation performance in the separation of CO/N(2) and CO/C(2)H(6) mixtures. The addition of polyvinylpyrrolidone (PVP) to ZnO-Phe composites could obviously enhance the separation properties of the system due to the strong chemical bonding force and the large specific surface area. Murine sarcomas (MS) are the most common cancer in pet dogs and account for at least 40% of neoplasia in dogs. MS occur in older animals and are generally highly metastatic and aggressive. These tumors are also relatively therapy-resistant and the median length of survival is less than one year. Thus, there is a great need to better understand the cellular and molecular events that promote canine MS tumorigenesis and resistance to chemotherapy so that more effective treatment regimens can be developed. Our long term objective is to understand the regulation of homeostasis and/or stress responses, such as cell cycle control, DNA damage and repair, and oxidative stress, in canine and murine MS. One approach is to study the molecular events that occur in spontaneous canine MS which are similar to human tumors. Previous studies of canine MS cell lines have focused on the genetic alterations, mutation, gene amplification and expression patterns
