What's new:

Drama Ten years ago—or was it twenty-three—I flew to Great Britain to meet with the Linsens, an ageing couple who had taken an apartment in post-war London and invited me to come and taste their home-cooking and swap some of my cooking. I admit, it was an odd invitation, and I do not think that they expected me to accept, but when I arrived and heard their arrival song, Twinkle, twinkle little star, which was still on the stereo, I was surprised to hear that my host had the same religious conviction as I. My only choice was to tell him, "Aw, leave it out, Mr. Linsen. We're not religious." So when he told me later, "Don't you think you should tell us, what do you believe?" I shrank down into my chair, and in a weak voice, I said, "It's too late. I have put my seatbelt on." Chris and Lindsay Linsen are a post-war couple who live in London. Lindsay works in marketing, and Chris, who was an American war hero, is retired. They are lively, wise, Catholic, short and well educated. Ten years ago, they had an apartment in London, where they hosted cooking classes and hosted an open house. While I was visiting, I learned what the Linsens love to do, by hanging around at the kitchen counter, eating Thai food and drinking wine. They do not have much ambition in advancing their cultural and culinary heritage, but did invite me to stay in the apartment indefinitely. This turned out to be a costly mistake. A month into my extended visit, I noticed the Linsens stopping into The Spirit Player Church, a Catholic mission in London, a church to which I could only occasionally attend. After about a month, I was tired of the Linsens and felt that it was past time for them to be sent back home. While I was on a visit to another country, I wrote my host to tell him that I was sorry, I could not be a further encouragement to their efforts, but I was pleased that we had a relationship that was not a cause for misunderstanding or further ignominy. A few weeks later, Lindsay was at a church meeting, and he came back happy-looking and got on a computer to tell me, "
