Understanding Photoshop's Layered System Photoshop uses a layer-based editing system (see Figure 1-1). A new file or document starts life as one or more layers with no visible effect. When you add a new layer, you see an icon, which you can manipulate to shape your image. You can duplicate layers or merge layers (applying them together) and combine layers (choosing an overlaid effect). You can also make specific layers transparent (see the upcoming "Transforming Layers" sidebar) to alter the final outcome of your image. Photoshop also enables you to work with selections, which are areas of your image that you can turn into special layers. Creating a selection involves holding down the Shift key and dragging a selection tool across your image so that it traces out the area you want to select. Once you have a selection, you can then use your selection to alter your image by painting on the selection and then combining multiple selections together to make even larger areas (see Chapter 9 for more about selections). Figure 1-1: A new file or document starts with no visible layers. Creating a new file or document When you create a new file or document in Photoshop, it starts as one or more layers. You can add a new document or file in three ways: * Choose New from the File menu to create a new image. * Click the New button on the Windows taskbar at the bottom of your screen, or press Alt+Ctrl+N (Mac) to open the New dialog box, and then enter a file name. In this post, you will learn how to refresh dynamic content in your Microfrontends environments in Azure portal. You may see your Azure subscription is showing yellow health. This is because your subscription is only showing five service tiers for a PaaS (Platform as a Service) environment. If you have no special requirements for service tiers, you can opt for a blue subscription. Use the below steps to resolve this problem: Go to the subscription where you don't want to show the five service tiers. Select the subscription options from the sidebar menu. Click on the drop-down menu and select the first service tier "General Purpose" in the "General purpose" drop-down option. If you select the service tier that you want to show, the blue drop-down menu will appear in the "General purpose" option. Now it's time to set your "Azure Consumption" level. Azure supports three different "Azure Consumption" levels, which are Free, Standard and Premium. You can check the subscription you selected previously, if it's "Free", click on "Manage billing level" button on the top right-hand corner of your dashboard. If you've selected the service tier where you want to show the "Premium" level, you can continue using the page. Now that the service tier where you want to show the free and premium level has been updated, you can go back and select the subscription option using "General purpose" service tier. Once selected, you can then toggle to the preview page. Now check the Azure Consumption level. Now if you select the service tier where you want to see the "Standard" consumption level, you will see the blue drop-down menu in the "General purpose" service tier. Click on the "View pricing" button and the standard subscription will appear in the Subscription section. Now go to the "App Service Plans" section and select the standard plan. Now check the Azure Consumption level. Now if you select the service tier where you want to see the "free" consumption level, you will see the blue drop-down menu in the "General purpose" service
