Mower By a strong consensus, electric lawn mowers are the best mowing tool for almost any grass, no matter how long or short, or thick or thin, and no matter how you wish to mow the grass. But for dense grass or large gardens, or if you simply don't need the boost that an electric mower offers, there's a best non-electric lawn mower for you, a tool that mows the grass just as effectively, that just happens to not come equipped with an internal engine that requires electricity to run. My task today is to show you why the best non-electric lawn mower is the Hedgehog. It's not for all gardens First, let's talk about one of the biggest reasons why people steer clear of non-electric lawn mowers: they simply won't mow the grass. A lever-based push mower, this one has the mower blades mounted on a lever that extends out to the right of the machine. Moving it back and to the right, pulling the lever will lower the blades, thereby cutting the grass. You see the same basic principles at work in most mowers. A bull-horn mower has the blades mounted to a handle that extends out to the right. Whichever mower you choose for your garden, though, you will almost always have to lift the mower to both turn it on and push it down through the grass. Electric lawn mowers, on the other hand, only require you to push a button or key to start the mowing, and as you mow, the blades are pulled up to the required height before the mower then moves itself forward as you push the levers forward with your legs. The electric versions of these mowers are simply leaps ahead of the non-electric mowers, and the Hedgehog is no exception. Hedgehogs don't just mow, they mulch and flush That all seems to make the Hedgehog sound like just another garden push mower,
