influence of which a relative speed between a tool and the workpiece can be supplied, a drive for a feed spindle of the tool and a parallel, eccentric stepper motor or a serial, curved shaft stepper motor with two axes for transmitting movement from the program to the workpiece and driving the tool for the further program. Even if the element, for instance, the material, the shape of the cut, the position of the cut or other parameters of the machining process are coordinated relatively to one another in modern program controlled machining, the machining process does not always proceed as desired and as precisely as desirable due to the machining conditions, the ease of handling and the skill of the worker. In addition to the considerable cost of automatic machines, consideration must be taken into account that a programmed machining process is not necessarily the most economical and effective one. With a perfectly machined workpiece, a perfectly coordinated program for the cutting process is the best machining. In practice, however, perfection is seldom achieved in a human-performed machining process. The machining parameters of a processing or processing sequence may be changed again and again in many cases, and in one sequence again and again in the course of the machining process. For instance, the feeding rate may change stepwise from 2 mm/min to 2.5 mm/min and back to 2 mm/min. However, in the course of the machining process, new machining parameters may be obtained. To this extent, the direct control of the machining parameters is often not sufficient. A further programming of the machining process often necessitates a manual readjustment of the programming with considerable expenditure of time. Therefore, it is known to coordinate as quickly as possible the machining process with the programmed machining process, and to keep the worker from being idle. On the one hand, it is necessary to eliminate all errors in the programming which result in idle time, for example, a wrong positioning of the tooling, for example, the workpieces. For this, a reference feed
