One of the most important qualities of a leader is to be able to empathize. That doesn't mean you hand-hold; it means you step in when your subject is facing trouble. Hillary Clinton used her political experience to remind Sanders' supporters of the limits of his campaign: "I know, because I've been there before," she said. In my experience, people who are likeable also tend to be open to admitting mistakes. Overall, these qualities are most useful in contexts where someone has to persuade someone else. And that's why leaders often fail. Even when you fail, the failing can be instructive; the most successful figures in history had an "I got shit done" mentality. Think of the huge list of things that Henry Ford failed at but eventually came up with products that transformed the world. These failures weren't fatal but they helped Ford learn what he needed to succeed. I guess you could argue that Donald Trump is a successful leader, at least since he took office. But he's not an example that I can point to. So the real question is: What have successful leaders taught us? Mike Gatto will be leading a workshop next weekend at the Art of Leadership Institute's Annual Leadership Conference, "Managing Change: Leadership and Learning in a Fast-Moving Organization." Sometimes it's a matter of personal opinion, but for many people the skin of a banana is considered a delicacy. Whether that's due to its texture or to the abundance of flavour and nutrients that it contains, there's no doubt that the banana skin is something of an acquired taste. Why are bananas associated with summer? Bananas are more than just a summer fruit – they are one of the symbols of our diet, are they not? Banana is the staple fruit of an estimated 3.4 billion people and it is easy to understand why. The banana is a unique fruit: it combines sweet, sour and bitter tastes in a single fruit, meaning that it has to be eaten with great care as, despite its sweet taste, it is very hard to eat. Depending on the type of banana, the starch that makes up most

In vivo measurement of the humeral tunnel aperture in the anatomical treatment of glenohumeral instability. While the effectiveness of the anatomic treatment of glenohumeral instability is well established, the effect of overstuffing the glenoid on humeral tunnel placement has not been investigated. In this study we sought to determine the effect of humeral tunnel overstuffing on humeral tuberosity-tuberosity (TT), humeral tuberosity-radial head (RH), and radial head-axillary tuberosity (RAH) distances. Thirty-nine cadaveric glenohumeral joints were dissected and the following distances were measured: TT (mm), RH (mm), and RAH (mm). The humeral tuberosity was clamped 1, 3, and 5 mm posterior to the widest point of the first transcondylar axis (TTB) and the distance from the clamp to the extremity of the radial head (RH) and radial head-to-axillary tuberosity (RAH) were measured. TTB increased significantly with humeral tunnel overstuffing. RH and RAH did not change significantly, while TT decreased significantly with humeral tunnel overstuffing. There was no significant difference between the results obtained with the arm at 45° abduction and 90° abduction. However, we note that at 90° abduction, when the humeral head was centered on the glenoid, a humeral tunnel was placed that overstuffing the glenoid on 26 of the 39 specimens (67%). Our results suggest that while humeral tunnel placement does not change with humeral head displacement in the humeral notch, humeral tunnel placement may be suboptimal when the humeral head is displaced on the glenoid at 90° abduction. As such, we suggest that the effect of humeral tunnel overstuffing should be studied in a patient population to determine whether it leads to an inferior outcome in an anatomic treatment of glenohumeral instability.
