Unforgiven Organizer is a tool to help you maintain order in your life. Auxiliary arterial pressure increases blood flow and reduces vascular resistance in the awake dog. Blood flow increases during orthostatic stress. To determine the role of the venous return as a determinant of blood flow, venous outflow was controlled in anesthetized, surgically prepared, and unanesthetized dogs. In eight animals, blood flow was measured in the femoral, saphenous, and omental arteries during shock and raised venous pressure induced by caval compression. Compression also was applied to the abdominal aorta in two animals to prevent venous return. During compression of the femoral and saphenous veins, blood flow remained constant or decreased. However, blood flow in omental arteries increased up to 150% during venous compression. During compression of the aorta, blood flow decreased by 80%. After venous release, blood flow increased to 120% of control in one animal and was unchanged in the other animal. In the aortic compression experiment, blood flow was consistently less during hemorrhage than during balloon compression of the aorta. Blood flow was reduced only by 22% during hypotension and was not significantly different during the two types of cardiac arrest. These data indicate that elevated venous pressure increases blood flow in the omental arteries and that the vascular effect of orthostatic stress is, in part, independent of the venous return.
