Using HyperMotion Technology players can be aware of the most relevant opposition players for the next 15 yards, providing them with precise tactical information before they are even committed into a pass. Players will move naturally and without restriction from the ball and the flow of the game, enabling them to make the correct decision to achieve the best result. The gameplay experience is further enhanced by Zones and instructions, which are generated on pitch when a player is committed to a pass or is involved in a tackle by the opposition. Zones are visible when players tap into them, and will tell players how best to approach the pitch, such as from across the width or down the pitch. Real-life player movements enable the game's control logic to produce intelligent instructions. Microsoft is partnering with EA Sports to integrate HyperMotion Technology into Fifa 22 Activation Code and future game titles, leveraging cutting-edge technology to achieve better gameplay, including more realistic ball control and increased player mobility. "FIFA is the most authentic football game and we're thrilled to be partnering with EA Sports to deliver the most authentic and entertaining FIFA gameplay experience," said Olivier Riethmuller, vice president of the FIFA family at Microsoft. "We believe that technology will be the driving force behind future FIFA games and I am excited to be able to bring HyperMotion Technology, which is key to the new generation of Xbox One and Windows 10, to the world of football." "We're thrilled to be working with Microsoft to develop a higher fidelity representation of physical movement in players for FIFA 22," said Andrew Jones, executive producer at EA Sports. "By combining our long-standing experience in creating the best football game in the world with advanced technologies we are making a leap forward to the next level of soccer and physical movement."
