Javascript, Swing, and the Danger of Distributed Systems - killface The most common development process I see is a developer creating a website, then another developer creating a backend system behind the scenes. Why? Because that's how it's always been done!I remember the early days of web development, when you had to write all of your apps in CGI and HTML, no matter if they were front-end or back-end. This opens a door for years of security flaws. The more I think about it
